Improving typography through space

Published on Tuesday, May 4 2010

Yesterday I read a tweet that Vesit has become, yet another, type foundry added to Typekit's remarkable list of foundries; allowing us to rent quality fonts for use on our websites. As exciting as this is, along with other movements and progressions in web typography, it also made me think of how dangerous this can for the good name of Typography.

As designers, we see websites, their parts and a variety of other design elements being overused, misused and abused on a daily basis. We label most of these as "trends", but let's face it: We have all fallen guilty of them and in a way we should be glad they exist. It helps the special few break free and try something new (again, setting us up for another future trend).

However, I'd hate to see typography become just another "trend", when in my White space is an important principle of design missing from the page layouts of many novices. White space is nothing. White space is the absence of text and graphics. It breaks up text and graphics. It provides visual breathing room for the eye. Add white space to make a page less cramped, confusing, or overwhelming.

Design Tip: The Value Of White Space

by Larisa Thomason,

"Above the fold" isn't just a newspaper term. On the Web, it refers to the part of a Web page that appears in a visitor's browser without scrolling. It's the most valuable part of the page - and everybody in an organization wants that prime spot. But, in trying to please everyone, Web designers often try to stuff too much inside too small a space.

Remember the value of white space. It makes your page look more attractive, professional, and legible. All are key components of a successful Web site!

White Space and Simplicity: An Overview

The screenshot shows the Smashing Magazine website interface. At the top, there is a navigation bar with links for Home, Graphics, Inspiration, Coding, and Design. Below the navigation bar, there is a search bar and a newsletter sign-up form. The main content area features the article 'White Space and Simplicity: An Overview' by Vitaly Friedman. The article is accompanied by a large image of a robot and a yellow background with the text 'Is your service missing something? Email Marketing...'. To the right of the article, there are several advertisements, including one for 'activeCollab' and another for 'WordPress Marketplace'.

Grid Design, A Classic Beauty For Whitespace Freaks

One of the concepts in web design I like most is the grid, gridified design. Popularized by Grid-Posterboy Khoi Vinh the beauty of the grid finds its way every day more in modern web design. There are numerous examples of great grid design. Recently a grid CSS framework was released and many designers offer tools, aids to simplify grid design.

Whitespace Rules Grid Design

A central element to awesome grid design is whitespace. Whitespace and correct padding. Without those your grid-coolness will soon look cluttered and horrible. Both Mark Boulton's and Derek Punsalan's design excel in whitespace and look very spacious. A notable mention for the whitespace factor in grid design goes to the unfinished Avalonstar.

White Space in Your Web Design & Graphic Design

White Space in Your Design

White can be a soothing and relaxing color to see. For some people white is simply a refreshing color while for others it is a dull, common color. If you have been in the web business for quite a while you would often hear the word white space. What does this term mean? Simply put, white space is a term used to denote open space between designs. It is like creating a site that is neat to look at with lots of room or space. Most graphic designers often opt for having white space in their design because having a simply uncluttered site makes visitors and net surfers feel comfortable.

You have probably seen in the television people asking for help to renovate their house because they feel that it is too untidy and unpleasant to live with. Perhaps they want to change their furniture, change their wall paint or move a few things to make everything in order. After living years in complete mess and untidy house and after hearing thousands of comments from friends and relatives about their uninhabitable house they finally want to have a house that is neat, clean and simple for a change. After the renovation and remodeling you finally came home and were surprised with your new house. Isn't it a great feeling to come in a house that is tidy and roomy? Doesn't it make you feel you want to stay for a long time there?
